Predictive Services Discussion: An upper-level trough will break down the ridge over much of the West as an upper-low moves into the Northwest. A Pacific cold front will move through the Northwest and into the Northern Rockies and northern Great Basin. An upper-level trough will move over the Northeast, with another upper-level trough approaching the Great Lakes. Widespread showers with scattered thunderstorms are forecast across the interior Northwest, Idaho, and northwest Montana with wetting rain likely. Isolated to scattered mixed wet and dry thunderstorms will develop across the Sierra, Nevada, Utah, southern California, northern Arizona, and the central Rockies. Strong to severe outflow winds and hail are likely with some of the storms, with portions of eastern Oregon and western Idaho currently favored. Dry and breezy conditions are also likely along portions of the Sierra Front, the central Great Basin, and into Wyoming, the West Slope, and western South Dakota. There is potential for plume dominated wildfire behavior and pyrocumulonimbus development in far northern California, southern Oregon, and across much of the Great Basin into the West Slope.

Suicide Prevention Day

Firefighter Health/First Aid

It is fair to say that since the recognition of COVID-19 in March, our workforce has been in a Planning Level (PL5) level of reaction. We have been forced to adapt rapidly with ever-changing policies. This alone has created a stressful environment for many, and if you are feeling this way, you are not alone.

Our work as firefighters is not limited to wildfires any longer but has expanded to all risk, which brings even more exposure to stressful situations. Hurricanes, longer assignments, busier seasons, devastating fires...sound familiar? More time away from home and experiencing more stress can take its toll.

Learning to recognize the indicators that you or someone on your crew/unit/team needs additional support can be the difference that saves a life.

The mental health continuum can be used as a tool to help build resiliency, allowing for recovery from stressful events and reducing the chance of suicide.

ACTION:

1 – YOU: Assess where you are currently on the spectrum.

2 – As a CREW: Have each person on the crew write down three signs they exhibit when they are stressed as well as several things they enjoy doing to relieve stress.

Talking about stress can bring a crew/unit/team closer together, but it's not always easy to do. Consider discussing these questions to chat about stress and how to manage stress:

- How do you exhibit stress?
- Do co-workers have insights on how you exhibit stress?
- What stress-relief activities and strategies do you share with your co-workers?

Stress Continuum Model
