Predictive Services Discussion: Upper-level troughing will deepen along the West Coast as an upper low approaches and moves into southern British Columbia, and an associated cold front is forecast to move through the Pacific Northwest into the northern Rockies, northern Great Basin, and northern California. Breezy west winds are likely in northeast California where fire potential remains elevated, with breezy winds also expected across the east slopes of the Cascades and Columbia Basin. Isolated to scattered showers and thunderstorms are expected across portions of Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and into the central Great Basin and Colorado Rockies. Additionally, showers are likely in western Washington and northwest Oregon. Thunderstorms are expected on portions of the central and northern Plains into the Midwest, including some severe storms, with potentially heavy rain in the northern Great Lakes. Downslope flow off the southern Rockies will likely result in dry and breezy conditions in southeast Colorado and eastern New Mexico, and dry and breezy conditions are possible in portions of Kansas into Nebraska, Missouri, and Iowa. Thunderstorms are also likely along portions of the Gulf Coast.

NFDRS PocketCards

Weather – Fire Behavior Category

The National Fire Danger Rating System (NFDRS) PocketCard is a tool for field personnel to locally track fire potential throughout the season. It is based on historical weather and fire occurrence for a localized area. The PocketCard displays a general assessment of the fire potential and identifies combinations of local weather and fuel conditions that might contribute to severe fire behavior.

The PocketCard provides:

- A general indicator of the potential fire danger for a given rating or protection area.
- A graph showing the trend and status of the current year's fire season.
- A comparison of current year conditions to historical worst and average conditions.
- Fire danger values related to past large or problem fires.
- Critical local thresholds for temperature, humidity, wind speed, and fuel moistures associated with large or notable fires.

Discuss the following ways to use the PocketCard:

- Use it primarily before fires occur or before arriving at a fire. It is also useful during initial fire size-up, initial attack, and extended attack.
- Use it to learn critical local area thresholds that predict the potential for extreme fire behavior. Be aware that these critical thresholds can occur earlier or later in the season.
- Use it to compare current and predicted local fire danger to historical local fire danger for enhanced situation awareness.
- Use it to track daily fire danger indices that gauge the potential for weather and fuels to support extreme fire behavior, as well as affect the difficulty of control.
- Use it to supplement local experience.
- Use it as a point of reference for firefighters not familiar with the area represented by the card.
- When you receive a fire assignment outside your local area, visit the National PocketCard website, <https://famit.nwcg.gov/applications/WIMS/PocketCards>, where PocketCards are filed by geographic area.
- Put it in the pocket of all your firefighters and keep one in each fire vehicle.
- Post it in dispatch. Use them in briefings. Provide them to incoming crews.
- Do not use the PocketCard for site-specific fire behavior predictions, fireline actions, or without an interpretive briefing.
- Review definitions and implications of Energy Release Component (ERC) and Burning Index (BI) values.
